America Need Fear No Film Invasion, Says Director King

Because "Passion," a film made in Europe, has won a large and instant success in this country, some of the American producers are said to have been scared by its good acting and the technical efficiency it reveals, fearful of an invasion of foreign picture plays.

But Henry King, the well-known American director, says no such apprehension need be entertained. According to King, there are reasons aside from the technical inferiority of most pictures made abroad why they cannot hope to find general favor here. The chief reason is psychological, he declares, explaining that the phases of life shown in foreign drama do not appeal to our theatrical tastes.

"But the reverse is also true, and this suggests a danger to American producers who are seeking foreign markets. We must guard against making our picture plays too local in flavor and above all against writing our titles in advanced American slang. There have already been complaints on this score from England; they don't understand our fast changing idioms."

7 Million Dollars already produced from one of these wells and still going strong.

I am about to drill a well between the two wells referred to above. You can join me in this million-dollar speculation if you care to risk $20—or more. This is not an investment but a gamble. We will win or lose quick. If we win we win big. No stock. A clean-cut, legitimate chance in the oil game. Write quick for details and my bank references.
